Reynolds continued his deception of street one night when she found policemen in possession. Doors were broken in and windows smashed, while several men were moving roulette wheels and tables from the house. She was then informed there had been a gambling raid, and although all patrons had been arrested, her husband had escaped. He was later arrested, and she believed his story that the raid was a frameup to ruin him politically, she says. His conviction as a common gambler in the Court of General Sessions did not shake her belief in him, the piaintiff states. Reynolds was fined $250 and sentenced to three months in prison on the story of a New York business man who had been swindled of $53,000 man who had been swindled of $53,000 in Reynolds's house.
